The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times, writing on 24th ult., says:—The allies are no doubt in want of fresh troops, especially at Gallipoli, where the losses have been great as have been the void made by battle and disease. No less than 9,000 men were dead or horsed combat in the last eight weeks before Turkish reinforcements arrived here from Volo, with 2,000 troops, who were engaged in opposing the Greek invasion. But it could be wished that reinforcements of a better class could arrive from Portsmouth or Cardigan.

The London Times of the 8th inst., notices the deaths of the following officers—Mr. Brown, clerk of the Admiralty; Mr. W. G. D. St. John, Clerk of the Admiralty; Mr. Cavendish Hale, of the London, died of wounds received in the trenches; Lieutenant-Commander of the Albion, was killed in action; Mr. Foster, commissary of the Balclutha, died of wounds.

With the large fort on the north side (two tiers of guns and a third tier on barbets)—I think, Fort Constantine—she kept firing until the day broke and then stopped. The Sampson, disregarding the large fort, directed her fire on two very much more vicious little forts on the parapet of the precipitous cliff. The batteries of the two forts were Forts Constantine—the Waip and Telegraph forts. Occupied with these, she steamed right through the fire of the big fort, swept round in a beautiful circle, and then, as the night closed in, she fired her fire, however, which was directed throughout the day at these two forts seemed to have little effect. Silenced only at intervals, they continued a most gallant fire. As the Sampson was coming close to the shore, the Agamemnon was coming close to the north coast southward, to where the Sampson and Terrible were engaged. It was evident that this ship had a distinct mission. The "Cautious" was close to the shore, she anchored within 900 yards of Fort Constantine, and she must have been quite close to the very hot water. This was the position of the day, and here she came out, but only owing to the closing darkness. She was closely supported by the Sampson and later, and later in the day by the Bellefleur on which she was a guest for (Constantine I don't
